C. Laughton Bird — A Tribute

Laughton Bird was a maverick among music educators, one of the few who dared to face the new. I first met him in 1965, when he gave me the chance to teach a course, which he rather audaciously titled "Musicianship". Often he sat in on my classes — sat is the wrong verb. Laughton never sat: he sprang about on coil springs from one classroom to another, brimming with joy when things began to get moving, fretting when they didn't. He desperately wanted young people to feel the vitality, the excitement, the power they had within themselves to change and improve the world.

It was the energy, the conviction, that I loved and appreciated most in Laughton. Yet these were not his only qualities, nor even his greatest. He was supervisor of an ambitious and expanding music programme with all manner of teachers and students to deal with — and more than that, the administrators to whom he was responsible. He was able to deal with everyone joyfully.

I have witnessed him go after a board of education trustee with the bounce of an Indian rubber ball, in order to get more money for a special music programme. I was with him when he heard a newly-formed chamber music ensemble in the basement of a school — Laughton greeted the children, called them by name, and made them feel important in what, to them, must have seemed a rather fragile vocation.

Important — that was a word always on the tip of his tongue. Music was important, teaching was important, persuading people that music was important, was important. I have never met a man so obsessed with the importance of music, particularly in its new and most innovative forms.

Those of us who were fortunate to have worked with Laughton were inspired by his faith and enthusiasm. He lives on in the heart of every musician he knew and challenged. No one could ever forget that voice, full of fire and confidence, "Music is important!"
